Assignment:

1. Participation and attendance: Students will be expected to monitor current events as they relate to course material (e.g., watching the State of the Union address, a presidential debate, etc.) and be prepared to discuss in class.
2. Each student is to read selected sections from the texts for the course. Reading assignments average 1-2 chapters per week.
3. Writing assignments. Options are as follows:
 - a. two to three short essays (2-4 typed pages) that demonstrate the student's ability to understand and apply theories and/or models learned in class to communication events. Examples might include applying principles of Group Think to a small group situation the student is involved in; applying the Five Canons of Rhetoric to a speech the student has listened to; applying the Toulmin Model to a newspaper editorial, or applying the elements of non-verbal codes to a conversation.

- b. a formal term paper (8-12 typed pages, not including a bibliography) where the student researches a major concept studied in class in greater depth. Examples might include writing a paper on the rhetorical contributions of Martin Luther King Jr. or Margaret Thatcher; researching and writing a paper on the impact of a communication innovation on society (e.g., how the internet has affected political communication).
- c. an original research paper (8-12 typed pages, not including tables and presentation of raw data) where the student develops a research question, develops a methodology, collects the data and then discusses what their research has revealed (e.g., "Do males and females use cell phones for different purposes?", create and disseminate a questionnaire and report back the findings).
